Clinical Discussion Panel 1.1	Attachment Goes to Court – A Panel Discussion Panelists: Danya Glaser Pehr Granqvist Avi Sagi-Schwartz Miriam Steele Marinus van IJzendoorn In this panel, we discuss the use of attachment theory and research in the family courts. The discussion focuses on two areas: (1) custody decisions following divorce and (2) forensic assessments of children for whom abuse, neglect or risk for hampered development is suspected. Much of the controversy about attachment in the family courts rests on speculations and diverse interpretations of attachment theory, rather than on cumulative evidence-based research. This panel discussion – comprised of a mixed international panel of presenters with diverse practice- and research-based backgrounds – will raise central issues and research needs in order to facilitate responsible court practice and policy directions that will minimize developmental risks and maintain appropriate child-caregiver relationships.
Clinical Discussion Panel 1.2	A “family” of attachment-based relationship enhancement programs for couples and families with teenagers Chair: Veronica Kallos-Lilly The Hold Me Tight® Relationship Enhancement Program: The original ground-breaking program for couples. Greenman, Natasha Demidenko & Sue Johnson The Hold Me Tight® Let Me Go Conversations for Connection Program: Strengthening Relationship Bonds in Families with Adolescents Nancy Aikin & Paul Aikin
Clinical Discussion Panel 1.3	Application of Attachment Theory and Research as a Framework for a Collaborative Divorce Model and Process Panelists: N. Sonya Vellet Yuval Berger This presentation will explore how key concepts from attachment theory (e.g., a trusted attachment figure functions as a secure base and safe haven, repairs ruptures, and engages in appropriate limit-setting) and research (i.e., individual differences in caregiver-child and adult attachment patterns) can be applied as a framework for a collaborative divorce process. The collaborative divorce process (including the collaborative participation agreement, the cohesive functioning of the team, specialized support offered within a relational context) can represent and provide the adults with the experience of safety and ‘felt security’, that likely has been disrupted during the dissolution of the marital relationship, to support a reorganization and restructuring of the family post-separation. The collaborative divorce team also tailors the approach to the individual adult and caregiver-child attachment patterns in the family. This process also builds the parents’ relationship capacities to be able to offer ‘felt security’ to their children.

Clinical Discussion Panel 2.1	Working through attachment relationships to improve quality of life for people with an intellectual disability Chair: Carlo Schuengel Panelists: Rinat Feniger-Schaal Paula Sterkenburg Efrat Sher-Censor Intellectual disability (ID) primarily affects social adaptive behavior, which in some cases may deteriorate into endangerment of self and others. People with ID are as a result overrepresented in residential settings for youth mental health care, prisons, and care homes. The regimen in many of these settings may involve the use of behavioral, pharmacological, and mechanical restraints, or seclusion. This panel brings together clinical researchers and practitioners to discuss how insights from attachment theory and research may be employed to reduce such practices, improve quality of life, and promote adaptive development. Key questions to be discussed by the panel and with the audience are: (a) how may attachment-based interventions make restraints and seclusion obsolete?; (b) how may family carers and professionals be supported in building high quality relationships with people with ID?; (c) what are clinical research priorities in this field and how should these be pursued?
